Hello Kate! This is just an update about the yellow looking blusher from Jill Stuart's S2014 collection! I finally received it after arguing endlessly with Canada Post about my package that was supposed to arrive 2 weeks ago. I popped it on my cheeks today and it turns out to be a apricoty reddish shade with quite some luminous quality! It's definitely not frosty, the yellow shade has some pearl in it but when you blend it on with the included brush it just turns into the prettiest highlight! I don't know if you're into that kind of stuff but this blusher seems to be on the overall warm side (not your kinda stuff) in a reddish blusher way (totally your type of stuff). I wouldn't describe it as a tomato red though, AT ALL. Maybe it's because my skin displays a much stronger warm undertone than yours, on me it just looks like a lot of blood flowing through my capillaries--in a good way. I mixed all the shades together to get this effect, but since there's a few shades (3 warm, 1 cool) you can mix it up to get what you want. I wonder what has happened to all the other JS items you talked about on your blog about a thousand years ago? Your JS blush post was the one to introduce me to my first blusher from them! (I chose one of the ones you liked the most, Petit Bouquet, but it was soon discontinued after I bought it so I used it about 3 times before putting it in my precious MU drawer) I started hauling Mix Blush Compacts and never even looked at the Blush Blossoms until now...I have almost all their blushers...OMG
